

In the year 3098, humans fled Earth amid chaos. Wars had ravaged the planet, leaving its surface desolate and its sky darkened by pollution. Spaceships carried the remnants of mankind to distant galaxies.

In one such ship, Captain Jane led a group of survivors on a daring mission to find a habitable planet. The Stardust Voyager cruised through space, its crew hopeful but uncertain.

Inside the ship, the crew gathered in the mess hall.

"Why haven't we found something yet?" Tom, the young engineer, dropped his hand on the metal table, startling a few members of the crew. "I mean, it's been months. We should've detected something by now." He sighed.

Captain Jane held up a hand to calm him. "No need to be—"

An alarm blared, cutting off her words, then the white lights became red. The deafening sound made the crew cover their ears, but when the ship started trembling, they abandoned that to grab onto anything that would help them balance.

"What's happening?" yelled Sarah, the navigator.

Tom stumbled to the nearest console. "There's been an impact off the starboard bow." Tom tapped on the screen. "Likely just debris from an asteroid, but there's structural damage."

Panic spread among the crew as the ship continued its convulsions.

Captain Jane rushed to the control room, shouting orders. "Emergency protocols! Engage shields!"

The crew rushed to secure the ship, their frantic desperation adding to the chaos around them, but the shields held. After what felt like an eternity, the ship steadied, red lights switched back to white, and the alarms fell silent.

The crew could finally breathe again.

"The shields are strong, Captain," Tom said from the control panel. "But we need to repair the damage before something else hits us."

"Agreed," Captain Jane said with a nod. After glancing at each member of the crew in the control room, she clapped her hands together. "Let's get to work."

The crew dispersed, working with a precise focus to fix the ship.

Hours passed, and the repairs were almost complete, when a transmission came through.

"Unknown vessel approaching, Captain," announced the communications officer. "Unmarked and unregistered craft, and no ID in the transmission code."

Captain Jane's eyes widened. "Prepare for a potential threat," she said, looking at her crew. "They may be pirates."

The crew took up their battle stations as the mysterious vessel drew nearer. Though ready for action, they knew it would be a short fight, one they likely would not win.
